Aharon's Passing Away

Page 458

On the first of Av, in the fortieth year of Israel's wandering in the Wilderness, at the age of one hundred and twenty-three years, Aharon passed away and was succeeded by his son Elazar. Aharon had the satisfaction of seeing Elazar clothed in the vestments of the Kohen Gadol, thus seeing how a great father was succeeded by a great son.

It all started with the Jewish people camping next to "Hor Hahar" [lit. Mountain of the Mountain]. As Rashi explains that it was given this name because the configuration of the mountain was like that of a small apple perched atop a large one, or like one mountain atop another one. Then Hashem commanded Moshe: "Take Aharon and his son Eleazar; bring them up to Hor Hahar... divest Aharon of his official garments, enrobe his son Eleazar with them..."

Ramban surmises that after Aharon performed the final Tabernacle service of the afternoon, and while he was still clad in the vestments of the Kohen Gadol, Moshe summoned him to the mountain and, by means of the change of vestments, transferred the office of Kohen Gadol from him to Elazar.

Then Aharon died through 'Mitat Ne'shikah' - death by a kiss of G-d - as it were, meaning that his soul became united with Hashem. The Talmud describes this as the most exalted form of death, likening it to pulling a hair from milk, meaning that the soul leaves the body without resistance.

Rashi cites the sequence: Moshe brought Aharon into a cave, where there was a made-up bed and a burning lamp. Moshe told Aharon to mount the bed, straighten his arms, and close his mouth and his eyes.

R' Tzaddok HaKohen explains that to the extent that people sin in life and establish a bond between their souls and the pleasures of this world, it becomes difficult for them to part from physical life. For those who become totally attached to physicality, the Sages liken death to pulling embedded thistles from sheep's wool. But for those of the stature of Moshe and Aharon, whose souls remained as pure as when they first arrived on earth, there is no effort, no regret, and no pain when the soul is reunited with its G-dly source.

When the Jewish people perceived that Aharon had passed away, "The entire house of Israel" observed a mourning period of thirty days. As Rashi explains, Aharon was mourned by everyone, men and women alike, because Aharon pursued peace and extended himself to bring harmony between adversaries and between man and wife.

Shabbat Shalom!

Rabbi Binyamin Bar
