Questions and Answer on Shabbat XI

How can selling aliyahs be permitted on Shabbat & holidays if business transactions are prohibited?

There is a subtle but significant difference between a business transaction and selling aliyahs: the latter is essentially a pledge to donate Tzedakah and not a real bill of sale. Herein lies the reason why auctioning off synagogue privileges is permitted on a Shabbat or holiday.

Jewish Law discusses the concept of what is considered a business transaction, which is prohibited on Shabbat. There are many details concerning these rules; here are a few:

Promising to give Tzedakah is not considered true business because it is beneficial to the donor as well - for example the upkeep of the Synagogue (which he too will enjoy) - therefore it is considered as if the donation is not truly leaving his own possession. Another consideration is that there is no actual transference of an object from one person's possession to another in exchange for the promise of money - rather the person is receiving an honor.

All of this only applies when no actual money is changing hands - for if it was, then that would be prohibited.

Is it permissible to pay someone for services rendered on Shabbat?

You cannot pay someone for services rendered on Shabbat. However, you can pay for something that was done before or after the Shabbat and "included" in the fee is the work that was done on Shabbat. In other words, when we pay a Chazzan, we tell him that we are actually paying him for the preparation and rehearsal which he did before Shabbat.

When paying a babysitter after the Shabbat (because on Shabbat we are not allowed to handle money), you should ask him or her to wash a dish or any other work for you, and then you are paying for that service which is done after Shabbat – and you have every right to pay $25 for a washed dish!

Am I allowed to give a gift on Shabbat?

It is only permitted to give or receive a gift on Shabbat or Yom Tov if the gift is for that day. For example, if you are invited to eat a shabbat meal at someone's house it is permitted to bring along a bottle of wine for the meal. (One may only carry within an area surrounded by an 'Eruv'. If you are not within an eruv, your gift should be brought over before Shabbat, and may be later presented once Shabbat commences, if you so wish.)

Shabbat Shalom and Shana Tova!
Rabbi Binyamin Bar

Thank You
